Winter 1862 marked a turning point in the Civil War. The North finally achieved its first major victory and gained an unlikely hero nicknamed “Unconditional Surrender” Grant. The Confederacy lost control of major rivers and supply lines, territory in Western Kentucky and Middle Tennessee, and over 13,000 Confederate soldiers were imprisoned in Northern prison camps.

Today, Fort Donelson National Battlefield interprets the story and the legacy of the 1862 campaign between Union forces commanded by Ulysses S. Grant and Confederate forces commanded by John B. Floyd and others. The National Park Service preserves the earthen fort and outer defenses, surrender site, and National Cemetery.
