DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

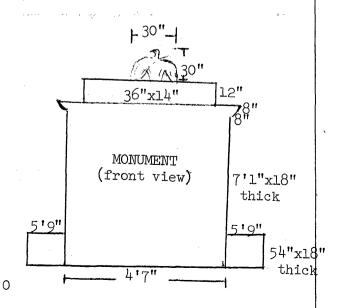

The Battle of Tupelo was fought in and around the hamlet of Harrisburg and the town of Tupelo. Today, the low rolling hills around Harrisburg which, since the war, have been incorporated into the town of Tupelo is now a residential section. The battle was fought in a typical southern countryside of cleared fields, forests, cornfields and orchards. Today, banks, churches, residential homes, streets and highways crisscross the area.

The position selected by Union General A. J. Smith to receive the Confederate attack was well suited for defense. After the running skirmishes of the 13th, General Smith wanted to occupy a strong position in and around Tupelo and await attack. This and two other goals made him choose the site that he did. His other goals -- secure Tupelo and gain a lodgement on the Mobile and Ohio Raildond. His battleline, forming a right angle several hundred yards north of Pontotoc road, was on the crest of a low ridge overlooking Harrisburg Branch. From the position held by the 12th Iowa and Murray's brigade, the Federals looked westward toward Pontotoc, the direction from which the Confederate Generals Lee and Forest would advance. the Union front, the terrain sloped gradually down to Harrisburg Branch, beyond which the country was an undulating woodland with scant undergrowth and heavily timbered. From Smith's line, which was slightly over a mile and one-half in length, the distance to the edge of the timber in front varied with the meanders of Harrisburg Branch, which marked the limit of the clearings. Opposite the sector held by Murray's brigade, about 300 yards separated the Union battle line from the timber, but the woods were so open that the Confederates would be visible for the final 500 yards of their approach. Along other sectors of the front, the Rebels, as they advanced to the assault, would be exposed to artillery and small arms fire for distances varying from one-fourth mile to 1,000 yards.

The monument at the site is made of granite and rests on a granite base 12" thick.

The Battle of Tupelo was fought on July 13-15, 1864. General Stephen D. Lee was in command of all Confederate forces in Alabama, Mississippi, and Eastern Louisiana. He relied on Major General Nathan B. Forrest to protect the rich prairie section of Eastern Mississippi. Forrest had protected the prairie and in July of 1864 he was called to battle again when A. J. Smith's Federal army moved toward Tupelo. Grant's tactics called for a diversionary attack in North Mississippi to keep Forrest occupied while General William T. Sherman moved from Tennessee to Georgia on his march to the sea. As for the battle, neither side could claim complete victory.

Sherman wanted Forrest destroyed for if he wasn't he would be free to fall upon and wreck the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad over which Sherman received his tools of war. To wreck Forrest, he sent General A. J. Smith with more than 14,000 soldiers and 24 cannon. General Lee, on July 14, had 9,500 effectives, supported by 20 cannon. Forrest's men opened the battle as they dashed on foot toward the Federal position. For three hours they attacked and fell back. After a lull this continued but to no avail. That night, because of the condition of his troops, Smith fell back four miles. Again on the 15th, the fighting resumed and the next day Smith moved his army toward LaGrange. The Confederates followed but without making another major attack. The important result was that Smith had kept the railroad safe and supply lines open.

The site is located on a slight hill overlooking the area and because of landscaping and no high rise buildings one does not have a sense of congestion. This memorial is interpreted by two interpretive panels and as the terrain has not been altered immensely, other than erection of buildings, one may still sense and understand the flow of events that occurred here. However, more and more construction is going on in this area and the open area to the west is being rapidly developed.
