Bison Controversy Heats Up

Yellowstone Superintendent Michael Finley announced Wednesday that bison have continued to migrate near Stephens Creek along the northern boundary of the park. The Interim Bison Management Plan (approved and signed on August 5, 1996) requires that all bison along the northern boundary moving toward adjacent private land where cattle are grazed must be captured and transported to certified slaughter facilities.

However, the plan does provide that "should unusual circumstance develop that are beyond the range of environmental conditions experienced since 1984-86, the agencies may develop contingency plans to assure that removals of bison outside of cattle-free public lands in Montana do not compromise the integrity of the bison herd within Yellowstone National Park." These unusual circumstances now exist with the severe weather conditions the park has been experiencing, the large numbers of bison already taken to slaughter facilities or shot, and the significant winter mortality of bison expected this year.

To mitigate these impacts, the park began testing all captured bison on January 21, 1997, at the Stephens Creek facility. Bison that test seropositive will continue to be shipped to slaughter facilities; bison that test seronegative will be held in a separate area at the Stephens Creek facility while discussions with the State of Montana to develop contingency plans continue.

On January 21, 46 bison were tested for the brucella organism by a veterinarian from the Department of Agriculture's Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service (APHIS); test results showed 30 bison as seronegative and 16 seropositive. (Testing seropositive to the brucella organism does not mean a bison is infectious and capable of transmitting the disease; it indicates the bison was exposed to the brucella organism at one time.) Fourteen of the seropositive bison were shipped to a slaughter facility in Columbus, Montana, Wednesday morning (January 22). The remaining two seropositive animals had to be shot by park staff because of injuries sustained during capture operations (a yearling bull on January 21, and a cow on January 22). There are approximately 80 bison in a larger pasture being held until they can be processed.

Other significant events:

- On Wednesday, a coalition of environmental groups asked U.S. District Court in Helena to issue an emergency injunction halting Yellowstone's portion of the bison program.

● Also on Wednesday, The National Wildlife Federation and the Intertribal Bison Cooperative launched a comprehensive campaign to restore wild buffalo to tribal and ultimately to public lands in the West. As a press release from the National Wildlife Federation states, "This agreement provides an alternative to the ongoing massacre of Yellowstone buffalo by providing a process for Native American management of the animals."

● Montana officials decided Wednesday to erect a fence to block some of the bison migrating from the park across a valley floor north of Gardiner and west of Jardine. The fence will try to plug one of the routes used by bison trying to reach grazing areas across the park line. The fence was the option approved by Governor Racicot at a meeting with wildlife and livestock officials.

Clean Up After Your Dog!

Mammoth dog owners need to take a little extra time after Fido does his/her business, even in the wintertime! Here's a helpful solution from Heloise's column that will make things a little easier. "To make an easy-to-carry, easy-to-use pooper scooper, all you need is a half-gallon plastic jug, like the ones milk or juice come in. Starting at the top, in front of the handle, cut out to the widest part of the jug, then continue around the jug until you reach your starting point. Voila! a pooper-scooper with a built-in handle. Remember, most of us are dog lovers, but we don't appreciate having to look or smell your dog's end results!!! Thanks.
